JUDY HALBERT

A co-leader of the Network of Performance Based Schools and an assistant professor of studies in Educational Leadership at the University of Victoria, Judy Halbert has been formally recognized for her excellence in school and provincial level leadership.

Judy is committed to developing strong learning communities through inquiry, thoughtful use of evidence, and teamwork across roles and districts. She is also especially interested in the role that formative assessment can play in developing learner confidence and meta-cognition.

Developing induction programs designed to meet the needs of new principals was the focus of her doctoral studies and has informed her work in the University of Victoria's Certificate of School Management and Leadership program and with leadership development across B.C.

LINDA KASER

Linda Kaser is also a co-leader of the Network of Performance Based schools. An assistant professor in Educational Leadership at the University of Victoria, she is recognized provincially and nationally for her work in developing networks that sustain learning change, her interest and application of critical thinking strategies and her contributions to strengthening the literacy programs of the province.

Linda's doctoral study focussed on building trusting relationships with learners, teachers and families. The application of the findings from her study has made a significant difference to learning at all levels by young people, adults and families. She is deeply interested in learning more from the aboriginal perspectives in our province, country and world.
